"Euripides and the Boundaries of the Human" (Lanham: Lexington Books, July 29, 2016).

My fourth book, "Euripides and the Boundaries of the Human" has already met with positive critical reception.

"In this useful survey of Euripides, Ringer (Marymount Manhattan College) contests the common view of the dramatist as an iconoclastic, ironic, and modern poet. In his introduction the author contends that Euripides's vision of the gods is traditional and Homeric, and that he shows little evidence of advocating the rationalistic and sophistic views offered by many of his characters. Ringer devotes each of the 19 chapters to one play, in each chapter summarizing the plot and offering interpretation ... Ringer makes a solid argument for seeing Euripides as a poet who accepts tradition, even while portraying characters who do not. This study will not replace early surveys such as G. M. A. Grube's The Drama of Euripides (1941) and D. J. Conacher's Euripidean Drama (CH, Jul'68), or handbooks such as Albin Lesky's Greek Tragic Poetry (1972) and Edith Hall's Greek Tragedy: Suffering under the Sun (CH, Aug'10, 47-6703), but it deserves to be read alongside them. Summing Up: Recommended. Upper-division undergraduates and above." (CHOICE)

"Euripides and the Boundaries of the Human is a lucid, well-written and comprehensive overview of Euripides' work. Each chapter gives a thoughtful and accessible introduction to one play and the scholarly debates surrounding it, which will be useful for both students and scholars."
